COMMENTARY AND OUTLOOK

All of the major global equity markets retreated in 2018 with a particularly destructive fourth quarter turning what had been good markets into bad ones and bad ones worse. Although regional factors produced some differentiation, investor worries on the global level were dominant. The resultant effect created a correlated and consistent downwards directional trend which had most of the major index returns solidly negative in double digit territory. Somewhat contradictory to usual theory, the lament of “nowhere to hide” was not only confined to equity investors but was prevalent throughout many alternative asset classes. Bonds, real estate and commodities also came under pressure during the year and reflected mounting concerns on many levels.

CGI was not able to side-step the indiscriminate selling onslaught that occurred in the latter part of 2018 and ended up below the benchmark with a -10.9% net asset value return, with dividends reinvested, compared to the S&P/TSX Composite Index (S&P/TSX) which posted a total return of -8.9% for the year.

Although both CGI and the S&P/TSX struggled with the lethargy that had enveloped markets for most of the year, they had been able to resist part of the general malaise and eke out slight positives up to the final quarter. The S&P/TSX had been treading water and holding its own around the flat-line and CGI had done better with good relative positioning, particularly on the individual investment level. While CGI had been able to show resistance to the downside for a good portion of the year, it finally gave way to the vicious and relentless market forces in the later stages of the decline. The Manager’s bottom-up stock picking strategy had been working well for CGI up to this point, but this advantage fell away and the positive performance differential was eliminated.

The selling process permeated almost all sectors in the S&P/TSX with only two of the eleven groups ending with positive returns at year end and only 56 of the 241 members in the S&P/TSX showing gains for the year. The Energy group has been a consistent underperformer for many years now and, with only a couple of exceptions; its comparative annual performance returns have resided at or near the bottom in terms of ranking. Since 2011, CGI has been consistently underweight the Energy sector so, in retrospect, its relative positioning has been good. The top performing sector in the S&P/TSX was Information Technology. This remains CGI’s largest relative overweight sector. Usually a good place to be in the late-cycle stage of a market, it is the intention of the Manager to maintain a high level of exposure to this category.

Economic growth had good momentum in 2017 and 2018, however, risks of economic divergence, signs of de-synchronization and overall slowing global growth have formed headwinds and caused investor perception to change. Even though fundamentals are expected to remain healthy and offer support in the near to medium term, a growing pessimistic attitude has weighed heavily on markets. Known risks including trade wars, a China slowdown, Brexit, geo-politics and interest rate uncertainty, have created an unpredictable situation. Although difficult to assess, it is also possible that much downside is already in markets and any moderation or resolution of concerns could result in market recovery. However, while volatility and intense reactions to news flows remain in place, and it would be incorrect to be entirely dismissive of potential disruption. All considered, the Manager is adopting a cautious, neutral outlook while maintaining CGI’s diversified positioning to help carry it through the uncertainty, but will continue to make adjustments and look for opportunities to generate long-term value accretion for shareholders. So far this strategy is working. CGI has had a good start to the year with a recovery of both its losses and relative benchmark positioning and has posted a NAV return of 21.8% vs 13.3% for the S&P/TSX.
