COMMENTARY AND OUTLOOK

The world has undergone some profound changes in 2022 and, as a result, the macro landscape for the global economy and equity markets had deteriorated. Just as it appeared there was a chance that general life and its associated routines would be able to return to some semblance of pre-pandemic normalcy, the outbreak of the Ukraine war added to some of the more persistent negative underlying conditions and the general and fundamental economic backdrop has been reshaped. Some of the more prevalent issues include the difficulties of a squeezed supply chain, a zero-COVID policy in China and the dominance, throughout much of the world, of a stubbornly high and accelerating inflation rate, not been seen for decades.

All major global indices have tumbled through correction territory, meaning a drop of more than 10% from their peaks, with many crossing into bear markets, a drop of more than 20% and all kinds of investments from bonds to crypto currencies have lost significant value. It has been a somewhat unusual period, when correlations have been extremely high across so many asset classes. Investors across all asset classes have had to adjust risk measurement and valuation concepts as central banks were forced to reverse course and shift their attentions and support from the great unknowns of the pandemic to being laser-focused on the fight against multi-decade high inflation. Although most of the central banks started cautiously and slowly in raising interest rates, their tone and tempo has accelerated meaningfully. Investors have been unnerved, for, while the objective of higher interest rates is to get inflation rates under control, it is not something that can be used precisely and raises the risk of a central bank-induced recession.

The S&P/TSX Composite Index (S&P/TSX) has been able to do better than most of its peers on account of its sizable resource component, particularly Energy, but has still declined with a negative 1.0% total return for the eleven-month period. Although beneficial to the headline return metric of the overall index, the overwhelmingly skewed concentration in the S&P/TSX return mix caused by the Energy sector's standout performance has been a major contributor to the relative under performance of CGI which posted a net asset value (NAV) return, with dividends reinvested, of -14.1% for the same period. Overall, CGI's resource weighting is about the same as the S&P/TSX, but its mix is almost a mirror image with Materials making up about two-thirds and Energy one-third of the total. Over the years this relative stance has worked to CGI's benefit, though not so far this year. Generally considered favourable as a late-cyclical play, Materials had been gaining in popularity, but an abrupt change in the economic outlook from an improving growth to deterioration and contraction caused quite a reversal in fortune for most of the constituents in the group, including the gold stocks.

Shareholders' expectations and the Manager's commitments are aligned and the objective of maintaining a consistently broad exposure to the Canadian equity landscape is paramount. So, although there can be disappointments in the short term, CGI stays the course and will continue to provide an attractive and unique way for investors to participate in the Canadian market while benefitting from an investment strategy proven successful over the long term. CGI has always maintained a portfolio of diverse, high-quality investments and will participate in any prospective market recovery. CGI has experienced many down-market cycles in its long history, all of which are disappointing in the short term, but its time-tested investment philosophy and structure has been proven and has delivered a track record of good performance to its shareholders in the long term.
