COMMENTARY AND OUTLOOK

Canadian markets have been choppy in 2023. Encouraging upwards swings have been met with offsetting reversals and have resulted in a series of stalemates within the overall timeline. But, as have many of its peers, the S&P/TSX Composite Index (S&P/TSX) has so far shown a decent resilience to the downside and, although the upside has been limited as well, the S&P/TSX has had a positive total return of 7.5% as at November 30, 2023. By comparison, CGI has exhibited its recovery potential in 2023 and has posted a favourable net asset value (NAV) return, with dividends reinvested, of 12.6%.

Sectors within the S&P/TSX have performed differently relative to each other compared to the recent past. One of the changes involves the Energy sector, an area of great influence in the Canadian market as the second largest group in the S&P/TSX. After sitting atop sector rankings with spectacular outperformance in 2021 and 2022, the volatile Energy group has settled down somewhat and has not dominated the returns universe in 2023. On the flipside, there has been a big year-over-year turnaround in Information Technology which holds a big return lead amongst the sectors in the S&P/TSX. After an abysmal 2022, the group has been a strong performer in 2023, benefitting from investors rotating into riskier asset categories. Both trends have been positive for CGI as the portfolio remains underweight Energy and significantly overweight Information Technology.

Importantly, the Canadian market is showing a better balance in return availability from both sector and individual constituent perspectives. CGI has a diversified portfolio and has been handicapped the last couple of years by the narrowness of the underlying drivers of S&P/TSX performance. Although difficult at times, maintaining a commitment to a time-tested winning philosophy designed to create shareholder value over time has proven invaluable. Once again, this patient approach is being rewarded as Energy dominance has now given way to the potential for a greater variety of choice and opportunity. Although not a guarantee for success, as good choices must still be made, it has usually been an environment in which CGI's selective, sometimes unique, positioning has done very well. The subdued market has resulted in a mix of individual performances, but a good majority of CGI's holdings have been able to post gains in the year-to-date period.

Despite the turmoil of a push and pull experience in 2023 so far, investors' confidence should be bolstered by the durability and resilience shown by equity markets. This encouraging development has helped to steady investors nerves and reinvigorate their appetite for stocks, but it remains a challenging market. Sticky inflation will force central banks to keep interest rate policy tight and its effect on the global economic recovery is indeterminable, a combination that is not typically market friendly. Headline inflation appears to have peaked in most regions and many central banks have become less aggressive in raising interest rates with expectations for a conclusion to the upward cycle, but economic data remains uneven. The scenario remains fluid and complex and even though uncertainty prevails with upside potential tempered by downside risks, there is scope for favourable returns going forward.
